

ABSTRACT

An echo cancellation circuit includes a variable offset comparator whose input is coupled to receive a transmission line analog signal level. The comparator has a substantially variable offset that is digitally controllable to represent an implied, variable reference level. An output of the comparator provides a value that represents a comparison between the analog transmission line signal level and the implied, variable reference level.